

DOUBLE ECLIPSE: MAGICAL MYSTERY TOUR

In the Tibetan teachings, New and Full Moons are considered as auspicious days, days to be set aside in the month for observation, and by observation, they mean observing our own mindstream. If the New or Full Moon is also an eclipse, then things are even more auspicious. It is said that at the time of an eclipse, the winds and channels within the human body and spirit are aligned and naturally come into balance.

In summary, according to the Tibetan Buddhists, eclipses are auspicious times, and the rare double-eclipses (two eclipses back-to-back, 2 weeks apart) are even more so. This two-week interval between double-eclipses is somehow a magical time, a time we should all remain aware of and in.

And these unusual double-eclipse times act as bookends for a two-week period of enhanced vision and change. I have written about the vision of the eclipse many times, and here is a free booklet to get those of you new-to-this up to speed. It is called the "Vision of the Eclipse" and can be found here:

Additionally, in the last 24-hours or so, after many days of a quiet Sun, we have had three solar flares of the M-Class, the second highest class of solar activity. As I write this, we are in yet another solar spike. At the above link are two free books about solar activity, if interested, "Sun Storms" and "Solar Flares."

So, things are in flux and what is changing is no less than ourselves, who-we-are somewhere in there and out here. I always look forward to these double-eclipse times because I never come out of them unchanged. So I am going to strap on my seat belt, open my mind, and try my very best to remain aware during this time. And these eclipse times can be a wild ride. The temptation to put my head between my knees on the rollercoaster is understandable, but when I do, I miss what is going on.

As the Tibetans point out, eclipses are special times that should be set aside for observation, times when we can more easily observe our mindstream. And the vision that comes with each eclipse (see my free eclipse book for more details) is pretty much a roadmap of what is coming and where we are headed.

So, as I tell myself, heads-up!
