

IGNORANCE IS BLISS

November 8, 2012

By Michael Erlewine (Michael@Erlewine.net)

I am slowly coming out of my deer-in-the-headlights trance of the election. I am glad it is over and very thankful for the outcome. Other parts of my life are starting to stir again, and here is one:

I have long spared my Facebook friends a peek into my double-life as a photography blogger, and I will continue to do so. You get to see some of my photos posted here, but none of the more technical chatter I am capable of. Not to worry, you are safe from direct exposure, and it certainly is not viral.

However, I should at least let you know that it exists. Just as I blog here, I also regularly blog at various photography web sites, mainly at NikonGear.com (perhaps the finest lens site on the Internet), where I am serving as the mentor of the Macro/Close-Up Forum.

NikonGear.com is mainly a site for professional photographers or was. I am not a pro, by choice. These days photography is a hard way to make a living , but what profession is easy?

Anyway, here is the cover and a link to a new free e-book of some of my more technical photography blogs from 2012. I am not suggesting you download it unless you are very, very interested in the inner workings of close-up photography. There are also some other, more general books, on close-up photography. The new book is the first listed here:

<http://macrostop.com/>